RE: Field testing of the PTSSA system in Afghanistan.

Dear Mr. Sprague:

As you know during the time period from April through June 2011 you afforded me the opportunity to field test and evaluate the PTSSA system in the Afghanistan theater while I was under contract there as a Supervisory Special Agent with the United States Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction (SIGAR). The many security challenges facing coalition forces in that environment are a constant presence and failures, specifically with regard to defective evaluation of local non-coalition personnel placed in positions of trust, are frequent and by design often result in high profile and strategically tragic consequences. There is no way to overemphasize the critical need to better evaluate the many local nationals used by coalition forces and other government sponsored aid, reconstruction agencies, and private companies for inherent security risk.

In my position with SIGAR I helped direct sensitive investigations and the expansion of the agency throughout Afghanistan. I was thusly able to apply what I knew about the PTSSA system specifically to this environment through many personal contacts, interviews, and encounters over a wide spectrum of theater applications and conditions. I conducted over 30 voluntary tests on a variety of willing personnel; US, foreign advisory, and local nationals. Essentially the results were amazing and truly demonstrated the general effectiveness of the PTSSA system in quickly identifying individuals whose risk profile is outside the scope of their purported intent. The potential benefits of a wide deployment of the PTSSA system in Afghanistan are very clear. The systems user friendly design co-located with composite language flexibility and voice over modifications targeted to blend with the local culture would be a seamless addition to applicant procedures and an unparalleled first step vetting of personnel for positions not only in Afghan law enforcement and military agencies, but for those seeking employment with US and counterpart coalition forces courting host nation nationals. As an investigative tool the PTSSA system also has huge potential. Ease of deployment, use, and training lend the system to rapid and immediate effect in various investigative scenarios most prominently those involving direct counterinsurgency in the field.

In summary my opinion is the PTSSA system is an important alternative and addition to the current personnel risk management profile and investigative techniques in play in Afghanistan. Specifically and most urgently the deployment and use of the system there would be a dramatic and practical component in combating the kind of nefarious insurgent led infiltration operations against coalition forces, contractors, and agencies that have claimed many lives over the past 10 years. Thank you for the privilege of field-testing this system in Afghanistan and I look forward to working with you again in the future.

Best regards
